WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

- There is currently no weather of concern until early next week when additional rainfall is expected Tuesday through at least the end of the week in addition to mountain snow and potentially strong high elevation wind gusts.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Dry weather is expected through Monday as high pressure moves over the region. North to Northeast surface winds in the northern Sacramento Valley and nearby foothills will produce clear, dry, and warmer conditions, while the southern Sacramento Valley and many other basins and canyons will have patchy dense fog. In some locations the dense fog will persist around the clock. The exception to this pattern will be tonight when a weak disturbance moving southward near the coast briefly interrupts the high pressure and produces variable cloudiness across the region and even a few light showers in the coastal range. On Tuesday, the first in the next series of wet Pacific storm systems will reach the coast with light to moderate rain and gusty Southeast to Southwest winds. Snow levels will be 5000-7000 feet Tuesday night and Wednesday as heavier precipitation and strong gusty winds spread throughout the region. Snow levels will fall by 2000 feet or so on Thursday as colder air moves in. Wet unsettled weather is expected to continue on and off for several days beyond that.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

The low pressure area which brought heavy rain and snow to the district yesterday is currently located just south of Point Conception. This low will slowly drop southward through the day which will lead to decreasing cloudiness over the central part of the state. There will still be some showers, mainly this morning, across San Diego County and Cleveland National Forest as well as the deserts south of I-15. Some afternoon showers may also develop on the north sides of the Angeles and San Bernardino National Forest during the afternoon hours. Additional precipitation amounts today will be under a quarter inch. Tonight into Saturday, northeast winds of 15-25 mph with occasionally higher gusts will be possible over Southern California. Temperatures will be 3-5 degrees warmer with skies turning mostly sunny. A weak disturbance is expected to quickly drop southward, which will lead to an increase in clouds and temperatures turning a bit cooler Sunday. Early next week, a ridge is expected to build over the southern half of the state, leading to a slow warming trend. Look for highs to return to near normal readings by Tuesday and Wednesday with sunny skies and light winds overall. Another significant storm system may take aim at the state Wednesday evening into Thursday. At this time, widespread rainfall in excess of 1-2" inches appears likely with this system. A weak system may quickly follow next Friday. Drier weather may return to the region by next Sunday.
